

Judging the Scottish Terrier

By Kathi Brown with Illustrations by Darle Heck

"His commanding presence, his unflinching gaze, his deep rooted conviction that he is his own man; these are the attributes of the adult Scottish Terrier of a proper type. Once witnessed, this attitude is hard to forget" Evelyn Kirk 1996

The silhouette of the Scottish Terrier is one of the most recognizable in dogdom. As a judge we go well beyond and are able to recognize, compare and contrast specimens according to the salient features and disposition of the breed. The Scottish Terrier is in all aspects a small, sturdy dog of serious purpose that will fearlessly go to earth after badger and other prey.

Scottish Terriers enter the ring with confidence owning the ground they stand upon. Many are busybodies and may resist the handler's efforts to face in the predetermined proper direction. Each dog should convey the belief that he is the best regardless of your judgment. In general appearance this is a compact, muscular dog of good bone and substance with a head that is long in proportion to its size. Check for a smooth flow of neck into shoulder, level topline, a pronounced forechest, and rump extending beyond the tail – the tail is NOT the end of a Scottish Terrier. An examination of dogs from the front and top is suggested to check expression but also for the proper width of the dog.

The dog goes around the ring covering ground even with short legs, reaching out with its front feet almost to the point of its nose and powerfully pushing with its rear showing good extension of the rear foot. Do not misconstrue lots of quick little steps for the effective reach and drive. Ears may fold back while in motion but the tail is carried up.

Judges should be sure to avail themselves of two major opportunities to evaluate the Scottish Terrier, table examination and free-standing. The first is a breed specific examination on the table which can confirm or change your initial opinion. Skillful grooming can both enhance the dog and camouflage problems. Hands-on the dog will uncover where hair is filling holes. Check the proportion and height of the dog (10" at the withers) with your hands. You should think "How could you possibly fit such a big dog in such a small, cobby package?" Stand back and take a minute to carefully observe expression. The ears contribute greatly to proper expression being "set well up on the skull" forming a straight line up from the side. They are relatively small and mobile thus you will want to check these again when on the ground and alert. The correct expression once seen is hard to miss again. The Scot will generally look down his nose at you with a penetrating gaze letting you know that he is in charge. It is described as ‘varminty’ and should NEVER be sweet, appealing or cute.

When I approach the dog on the table for hands-on examination I generally speak to the handler, “good morning” or “good afternoon”. This is not to be a jovial person but to elicit a response from the handler which will indicate to the dog that I am an acceptable person about to examine him. Reach out cupping the head underneath the muzzle at the same time determining its strength that fills a man’s hand and for a punishing, strong underjaw. Check for the proper equal proportion of skull to muzzle, place your thumb into the stop determining if the correct “slight but definite stop” is present rather than cut in by grooming. Feel under the hair to determine that there is true fill below the dark, almond, wide-set eyes. Although slightly domed the skull should appear flat and the planes viewed from the side parallel. While at the front of the dog I bring my cupped open hand on the chest feeling for the required forechest and prosternum then drop my fingers straight down between the legs to ascertain the relative straightness and width of the forelegs. Bite is level or scissors with LARGE teeth capable of encountering and disposing of quarry. The head is rectangular and of medium width, giving the impression of narrowness due to its cleanness of skull and overall length.

Move to the side run your hand down the strong ‘moderately short’ neck across the shoulders and body reconfirming a smooth transition into the “well laid back and moderately well knit” shoulders specified in the standard. It is important to check for an upper arm approximately the same length as the shoulder blade bringing the elbow next to the body below the widest point of the rib and well back on the dog. Judges should feel for the chest which is described as “broad, very deep and well let down between the forelegs”. It is a heart-shaped

(not slab-sided or barrel-shaped) chest in cross section tapering to a point and dropping down BELOW the elbow. The standard is clear that the “lowest point of the brisket should be such that an average man’s fist would fit under it with little or no overhead clearance”. To properly examine a dog according to the standard the judge should therefore measure width and depth by actually placing his fist under the dog. I prefer to do this measure from the side just behind the front leg at the deepest rib. If you are tall enough to do so from the front make sure that you do not place your face in the dog's and go back to the lowest point under the brisket. Continue along the ribs which should be "well back into a short, strong loin, deep in flanks". The inverse carrot tail is set on high and carried proudly. Check behind the tail for the point of ischium and the broad, muscular hindquarters with a well-bent stifle allowing for the breed to spring from rock to rock as well as to pull the vermin out of its den. The length from hock to heel is short and perpendicular to the ground.

A Scot's coat is critical to the climate of the country of origin and to the work it needs to accomplish. This is a double-coated breed with a HARD, wiry topcoat covering its dense soft undercoat. Check the texture by rubbing the top hair between your thumb and index finger then pick it up looking for the prerequisite undercoat. The dog's jacket should blend smoothly into its furnishings. The furnishings should never resemble a billowy skirt. The preparation and presentation of the Scottish Terrier takes skill, dedication and time on behalf of the owner and should be carefully evaluated and respected. Never rake the jacket backward toward the head. Scottish Terriers come in coats of many colors (except white) - all are equal; none preferred. White is allowed ONLY on the chest and chin and that to a slight extent."

The dog most often will shake himself out once again getting comfortable before moving. Going away rear the movement should be straight and true with good flex at the hock. The pads of the rear feet should turn up toward you. When judging front gait the forelegs are not exactly parallel to each other; there is a slight turn in as they reach out around the deep chest of the dog. The Illustrated Guide to the Scottish Terrier states, "It is important to note that a dog that is higher in leg will appear to move better in a generic sense. This is not desirable and is at the expense of Scottish Terrier type." From the side the dog carries a level topline. The reach from the front and extension and powerful drive from the rear should be evident.

The standard states clearly that "No judge shall put to Winners or Best of Breed any Scottish Terrier not showing real Terrier character in the ring." A Scottie is never timid and one with tail down should not be your choice. What then is true terrier temperament? While structurally the breed is a big dog on short legs it is a bigger dog in his mind as well; self-confident, sturdy on the ground which is "all his" and more than willing and capable of dispatching vermin in its den. This is displayed by the carriage of his tail, head and ears. It is helpful that you as a judge view the dog standing on his own rather than being poked and prodded into a predetermined stance. Sparring is useful to have the Scottish Terrier show himself. Judges should use the spar judiciously. You need not spar every dog. When pulling dogs to be sparred make sure you set specific guidelines to be followed. Dogs already exhibiting feisty behavior may not be necessary to engage with others. I generally spar two dogs under consideration and am thoughtful regarding which I need to see. It is not necessary to have the dogs cause a ruckus (although this may occur) but only collect themselves and stand boldly four-square.

I would offer all judges a few suggestions:

- Always move the Scottish Terrier prior to table examination. This is a breed that in temperament needs to “get the kinks out” and assess the ring on his terms.
- Never reach down and examine the dog while on ‘his’ ground; if you need to check the dog request it to be re-tabled.
- Remember this breed is dignified, self-confident, yet sensitive and they do not easily tolerate intimacy from strangers. So do NOT baby-talk, grab and hold his beard, pound on him nor become nose-to-nose with him.
- Provide shade on hot days for this generally dark, double coated breed.
- Control the ring, separating overly feisty dogs and controlling the spar.
